Combining the ancient art of healing with modern science

SOWA RIGPA,

the Buddhist art of healing

As one of the most ecologically diverse nations in the world, Bhutan was highly sought after by practitioners and physicians of sowa rigpa earning Bhutan the name; Land of Medicinal herbs. Patronised by kings, nobles and aristocrats, sowa rigpa flourished in Bhutan, reaching its peak during Zhabdrung Ngawang Namgyel's time.

Sowa rigpa combines knowledge of ayurveda, pre-buddhist religious traditions, and other medical systems of the time such as Chinese, Persian and European.

The Third Druk Gyalpo is responsible for mainstreaming traditional medicine in Bhutan with the establishment of the first Indigenous dispensary in 1968. Before him, seasoned and highly learned physicians of sowa rigpa served in the courts of both the first and second kings.

Today, sowa rigpa is an important aspect of Bhutan's national healthcare system.

OUR STORY

ACCESS AND BENEFIT SHARING-

Our business approach

We believe in engaging the local communities to ensure long term survival of medicinal plant species and prevent negative impact on the environment through sustainable practices. We source more than 200 species of medicinal plants from the wild with the help of local communities, bringing direct benefits to the people who collect, grow and supply them. We partner, support and depend on the local community groups.

The local communities engaged in plant collection live in extremely remote areas and we offer opportunities for them to generate income. In doing so, we ensure socio-economic wellbeing of these people while consciously using our natural resources. By working together with the community, we are pursuing the Gross National Happiness path.
